Military Action against Iran Still Possible: Israeli Official

JERUSALEM - A senior Israeli government minister on Monday said taking military action against Iran's nuclear program is still an option – despite growing international efforts to forge a diplomatic solution.

The comments by Yuval Steinitz, who heads Israel's National Infrastructure Ministry, reflect the continued tension between Israel, which insists the nuclear program poses a threat, and the international community, which is pushing for a diplomatic resolution.

Steinitz told Israel's Kolom radio that the military option remains on the table, despite efforts to promote a diplomatic solution. He said the situation remains fluid and that Israel must be prepared for any development.

The comments come amid growing international efforts to negotiate with Iran over its nuclear program. The United States, China, Russia, France, Britain, Germany, and the European Union have been leading the talks, which are due to conclude in July.

While there has been some progress in the talks, many experts believe a comprehensive deal is still elusive. Israel, which has repeatedly indicated it is preparing for a possible military strike, remains skeptical of a diplomatic solution.

The comments by Steinitz are likely to increase tensions between Israel and other countries, particularly those in the region.

Yemen Rebels Advance in Battle of Aden

Yemeni rebels, known as Houthis, have made significant gains in recent days, advancing into central Yemen's Aden province.

The Houthis, who control the capital Sanaa, have been fighting against the Yemeni government and backing a political group called the Southern Movement, which seeks independence for Yemen's south.

The advance comes amid a wider conflict in Yemen, where a Saudi-led coalition has been bombing Houthi-held areas since March.

The Houthis' advance has raised concerns about the stability of the country and the prospects for a political solution.

WASHINGTON - Iran's nuclear program remains a contentious issue between the United States and its allies.

As the United States and other countries continue to negotiate with Iran over its nuclear program, there are growing concerns about the possibility of a military strike.

In a move that could signal the beginning of the end of the talks, President Barack Obama last week announced that the United States and its allies would seek to re-engage with Iran in a new round of negotiations.

The announcement comes amid growing international efforts to resolve the nuclear crisis.

Iran has repeatedly said it is committed to a diplomatic solution, but has also indicated it is prepared to take military action if necessary.

The United States and its allies are concerned about the possibility of a military strike, which could escalate tensions in the region.

Iran has said it is willing to engage in talks, but is also insisting on its right to develop a civilian nuclear program.

In a statement released Monday, Secretary of State John Kerry said the United States and its allies are continuing to work towards a diplomatic solution.
