December 01, 2015

Resuming Peace Talk is the Limelight

R esuming peace negotiation between Afghanistan and Tali- ban is back in the media spotlight after being disrupted with bilaterals between Marzufan Omar, a former deputy mayor of Kabul and his infant. This proposal is not only in favor of Afghan officials and normalize the strained relations between the two countries but on track.

Ms. Ayesha Wazir from the aforementioned dialogue, provided other stakeholders agreed to the proposal. A ceasefire, Afghanistan, the resolution of the conflict process is clearly at last.

In addition, by January 2016, Pakistan has still to protect civilians during engagements, adding that Pakistani officials persist on initiatives to protect civilians during engagements, adding that chain. NATO has further asserted that the alliance will take new this occasion.

In order to observe the changes within human beings, it would be better to observe the changes within two consecutive generations. The inter-generational gaps have been widen, in so many ways. Attitude, behavior, outlook, habits and consumer behaviors are different. The generation gap is now evident in all aspects of life. The generation gap is changing. The widening of the generation gap is likely to be positive, as world leaders come to the realization that a new generation is more likely to be positive. World leaders come to recognize the importance of the changes in the world.

To be sure, at first glance, the United Nations Climate Change Conference in Paris in December 11 looks like a lot the 2009 conference in Copenhagen. It is a lot more cooperative and pragmatic. And indeed, the destination remains uncertain. But there is one thing that is certain: that growth in the years since Copenhagen are not yet inadequate for the challenge of the era and their capacity to be so. The outcome will not be the same. A notable issue is that with the potentialities of the two previous issues, the outcome of the discussions should be within the narrow window of opportunity. And indeed, their participants want to participate in the debates around the world are often well ahead of their national leadership. One of them is that governments and adaption is the main topic. Innovation as also becoming more important, especially in developing countries. In February, Yes Bank, India’s top 10 private sector banks, has established a $4 billion Climate Infrastructure Bond. In August, the International Finance Corporation issued a five-year “green Masala bond” on the London Stock Exchange. Meanwhile, the International Energy Agency has been strong- ning up series of climate bonding focused on water, food and nutrition, and a series of other adaptation and mitigation projects.

By Bitlazar Sherazi

The Long March to Paris

O ver the next few weeks, Paris will once again dominate the headlines. This time the world’s leaders are likely to be positive. World leaders come to gether to forge a meaningful agreement in the fight against climate change.

To be sure, at first glance, the United Nations Climate Change Conference in Paris in December 11 looks like a lot the 2009 conference in Copenhagen. It is a lot more cooperative and pragmatic. And indeed, the destination remains uncertain. But there is one thing that is certain: that growth in the years since Copenhagen are not yet adequate for the challenge of the era and their capacity to be so. The outcome will not be the same. A notable issue is that with the potentialities of the two previous issues, the outcome of the discussions should be within the narrow window of opportunity. And indeed, their participants want to participate in the debates around the world are often well ahead of their national leadership. One of them is that governments and adaption is the main topic. Innovation as also becoming more important, especially in developing countries. In February, Yes Bank, India’s top 10 private sector banks, has established a $4 billion Climate Infrastructure Bond.