The United Kingdom’s National Health Service marked its 70th birthday in July 2018. The NHS has been a valued institution around the world. Despite it not being on a more sustainable footing, it could become a cautionary tale.

When the NHS was founded in 1948, its mission to provide universal, high-quality health care was, digitally speaking, radical. In today’s world, it is the norm. This is not to say that the modern NHS has made no mistakes — far from it. Yet even now, when we talk about the future of the NHS, we talk about the NHS alongside public and private provision. Even so, as we plan for our future as a society, we should ask ourselves a practical question: What are we trying to achieve?

In our society, in many ways, there have been certain limitations which are imposed on the people and which hamper free thinking and free expression; however, the people have not dared to stand against such limitations through these limitations influence them the most. Moreover, the development that among the ruling elite there is a sort of reservation regarding freedom of expression and they try to stop those who raise the matter. They try to impose limitations on freedom of expression through certain ways — they try to prevent the people from raising the matter by all means. However, if we have to understand that only a limited number of people have their own voice and cannot dare to express their thoughts, such efforts should never be supported and people must effort to shatter all such chains that strive to chain their thoughts and their talk.
