Obama to Address Nation on Steps to Fight Terrorism

WASHINGTON - U.S. President Barack Obam~a is expected to address the nation Sunday night on the steps the administration is taking to fight terrorism in the wake of the shocking massacre in Paris that killed at least 130 people, the White House said Saturday.

Obama will provide an update on the investigation into the Paris attack and will speak in person to firefighters who were fighting a fire at a Paris suburb.

The White House said that it was "a significant" step for Obama to be taking by the U.S. government after the attack were aimed at fulfilling Obama's highest priority: keeping the country safe.

"The president said we will also do whatever it takes to protect our people," the White House said Saturday. "Obama will return to the steps the administration is taking to fight terrorism in the wake of the shocking massacre in Paris that killed at least 130 people, the White House said Saturday.

Obama will provide an update on the investigation into the Paris attack and will speak in person to firefighters who were fighting a fire at a Paris suburb.

The White House said that it was "a significant" step for Obama to be taking by the U.S. government after the attack were aimed at fulfilling Obama's highest priority: keeping the country safe.\n
"The president said we will also do whatever it takes to protect our people," the White House said Saturday.

"Obama will return to the steps the administration is taking to fight terrorism in the wake of the shocking massacre in Paris that killed at least 130 people, the White House said Saturday.

Obama will provide an update on the investigation into the Paris attack and will speak in person to firefighters who were fighting a fire at a Paris suburb.\n
The White House said that it was "a significant" step for Obama to be taking by the U.S. government after the attack were aimed at fulfilling Obama's highest priority: keeping the country safe.\n
"The president said we will also do whatever it takes to protect our people," the White House said Saturday.

"Obama will return to the steps the administration is taking to fight terrorism in the wake of the shocking massacre in Paris that killed at least 130 people, the White House said Saturday. Obama will provide an update on the investigation into the Paris attack and will speak in person to firefighters who were fighting a fire at a Paris suburb.

The White House said that it was "a significant" step for Obama to be taking by the U.S. government after the attack were aimed at fulfilling Obama's highest priority: keeping the country safe.\n
"The president said we will also do whatever it takes to protect our people," the White House said Saturday.

"Obama will return to the steps the administration is taking to fight terrorism in the wake of the shocking massacre in Paris that killed at least 130 people, the White House said Saturday. Obama will provide an update on the investigation into the Paris attack and will speak in person to firefighters who were fighting a fire at a Paris suburb.\n
The White House said that it was "a significant" step for Obama to be taking by the U.S. government after the attack were aimed at fulfilling Obama's highest priority: keeping the country safe.\n
"The president said we will also do whatever it takes to protect our people," the White House said Saturday.

"Obama will return to the steps the administration is taking to fight terrorism in the wake of the shocking massacre in Paris that killed at least 130 people, the White House said Saturday.

Obama will provide an update on the investigation into the Paris attack and will speak in person to firefighters who were fighting a fire at a Paris suburb.

The White House said that it was "a significant" step for Obama to be taking by the U.S. government after the attack were aimed at fulfilling Obama's highest priority: keeping the country safe.\n
"The president said we will also do whatever it takes to protect our people," the White House said Saturday.

"Obama will return to the steps the administration is taking to fight terrorism in the wake of the shocking massacre in Paris that killed at least 130 people, the White House said Saturday.