Afghan security forces have rescued 190 civilians from a Taliban-controlled district in northern Baghlan province, according to a statement from the Ministry of Defense. The residents of the district have been living under the Taliban's control for the past year, with limited access to basic necessities and services. The Taliban have been using the civilians as human shields, preventing them from seeking help or Aid organizations. The rescue operation involved a joint effort between Afghan security forces and Special Operations forces to free the civilians. The situation highlights the ongoing conflict in Afghanistan and the continued struggle for security and stability in the region.