Trump Confirms Details of Second Summit with North Korea, Touting Its Potential as a ‘Economic Powerhouse’

WASHINGTON - President Trump is looking forward to this month's summit with Kim Jong Un, a top US official told reporters, saying that he sees the potential of an "Economic Powerhouse" in North Korea. Following what he called a "productive meeting", the top US envoy and Pyongyang's representative met Monday evening to begin developing one. The question now is whether Paris is able to deliver the ambitious -and potentially costly- military project, as questions mount whether it would even have the financial muscle to do so.

"We have decided to issue a contract for a hyperspectral sensor for the French Minister of Economy," the report said in January, involving the VESI (Dense Vegetation Image) sensor from Valsatoid. The hyperspectral sensor will have a high-temperature capacity, allowing it to successfully cover such diverse areas as its cost-benefit ratio, and in particular, keeping an eye on the development of climate change issues.

"The French government is confident in the project's success and will continue to work on it," the official said.

"It is still too early to make any predictions about the future of the project, but it is clear that the French government is committed to making it a success," he said.

"The French government has invested heavily in this project and is committed to achieving its goals," the official added.

"We are working closely with our partners to ensure the project's success and to ensure that the national interest is protected."
