Trump Has Taken Few Steps to Disconnect from Private Empire

WASHINGTON - President Donald Trump has made only cursory moves to distance himself from his family-owned real estate business, raising questions about whether he is likely to sign an agreement in spring that would put his business under the scrutiny of the United States.

The agreement, signed by Trump and his government, is intended to prevent him from being an active participant in his business while he is in office. It is the first time for any non-ethical president that the Trump organization will agree to be placed under the control of an independent third party, who will be responsible for any potential conflicts of interest.

Trump's transition team has been accused of failing to disclose any plans for how the president will distance himself from his business, leading to concerns about a potential conflict of interest.

Many of Trump's business deals have been criticized for their potential conflicts of interest, including his recent purchase of the Washington Monument and his plan to build a hotel in Washington, D.C.

The agreement with the Trump Organization includes a provision that will require the president to divest himself of his business interests within 90 days of his inauguration. However, some critics have argued that this is not enough to ensure that Trump will be able to fully distance himself from his business.

Despite these concerns, Trump has repeatedly stated that he will do everything he can to ensure that his business interests do not interfere with his presidency.

The agreement will be reviewed periodically by an independent third party, who will be appointed by the president and approved by Congress.

This move is seen as a step towards addressing the potential conflicts of interest that have plagued previous presidents, including Donald Trump.

The agreement is expected to be signed shortly, and it is hoped that it will help to ensure that Trump will be able to fully focus on his duties as president.
