New Indian Envoy Vows More Strong Relations

Dubai, United Arab Emir---- The new Indian envoy to Afghanistan, Manpreet Vohra, said on Saturday that his country was eager to strengthen relations with Afghanistan. Vohra, who took charge of the Indian embassy in Kabul last month, said he was committed to promoting cooperation between the two countries.

Vohra, addressing a press conference in Kabul, said the Indian government was determined to expand economic and trade relations with Afghanistan. He added that India would continue to support Afghanistan in its efforts to achieve peace and stability. Vohra also expressed hope that the upcoming presidential elections would be peaceful and transparent.

According to an estimate by the United Nations, the U.S. government and its allies spent over $90 billion in Afghanistan from 2001 to 2012. However, the Afghan government has criticized the U.S. for not providing adequate assistance.

The new envoy said India would continue to provide technical and financial assistance to Afghanistan. He added that the two countries were working together to address the challenges facing Afghanistan, including terrorism, infrastructure development, and economic growth.

Vohra also called for increased engagement between the Afghan and Indian media. He said the two countries should work together to promote positive images of each other.

Meanwhile, the Afghan government has expressed its appreciation for India's support. The government thanked India for its years-long assistance and said it looked forward to further cooperation and trade between the two countries.
