Saleh Rejects SIGAR Claims of Cash Being Smuggled Out Through Airport

According to the report, cash counting machines, which were funded by the US government, are not being used for the purposes intended and the only cash counting machine confirmed to be working is in the arrival entrance instead of the departure area where strict cash controls are most needed to help prevent cash smuggling.

In addition, the machines lack connectivity to the Internet, which in turn prevents Afghan investigative authorities from tracking currency suspected of being laundered. "The absence of fully functional and strategically positioned cash counting machines, and declaration forms in the VIP section along with the limited screening of VIP passengers, who are most likely to have large amounts of cash, severely limits the Afghan government's ability to fully implement its anti-money laundering laws at the airport," John F. Sopko, Special Inspector General for Afghanistan Reconstruction stated in the report. (ATN)

Biden Administration and Afghan Peace Process

By: Najia Aasim

As expected, Joe Biden, immediately after taking oath as the 46th president of the United States, sat down to review the Trump administration’s decisions. He reviewed US involvement in the negotiations and will lead the peace parley to deadlock. Biden’s 100-day policy plan made a significant part of his election campaign, some of the urges that he is also related to the Afghan peace, which has been clearly expressed by the new administration as the Trump administration had not given it much respect and consideration. However, he made it clear that some policies that were pursued during the Trump era and reversing them altogether or taking measures that may not be so beneficial for the Biden administration. Among such policies, the US Afghanistan policy was one of the issues, particularly, after a peace deal has been signed between the United States and Taliban.

As far as US-Taliban deal signed, in February last year, is concerned, Biden administration will most likely review the deal. Joe Biden’s nominee for secretary of state, Antony Blinken, has mentioned that the Biden administration will “reassess the US-Taliban peace agreement with the Taliban”, while talking to US Senate confirmation hearing, he mentioned, “We want to end this accursed forever war. We want to bring our troops home. We want to retain some capacity to deal with any resurgence of terrorism, which is what brought us in the first place. ... We have to look carefully at what has actually been negotiated. I haven’t been privy to it yet. We must closely assess the US-Taliban peace agreement, still do not know the details of this agreement”. This clearly shows the intentions of the new US administration, and is also as per Joe Biden’s peace campaign’s slogan of “responsible withdrawal” from Afghanistan. But the question is: Can this step lead to a responsible role of the US in the Afghan peace process?

Nevertheless, the decision of reviewing the US-Taliban deal has further been confirmed by the US National Security Adviser (NSA) Jake Sullivan. In a conversation with The Guardian, Sullivan talked to Afghanistan’s NSA, Hamdullah Mohib, last week and “made clear the US’s intention to review the US-Taliban deal, including to assess whether the Taliban was living up its commitments to cut ties with terrorist groups, reduce violence in Afghanistan, and engage in meaningful negotiations with the Afghan government and other stakeholders.” He further added “The review process includes first determining the terms or conditions set in the agreement, and can even partially implement the US’ withdrawal from Afghanistan in May 2021. It can also envisage the Taliban to spread or cut off their support of other militant groups of Pakistan. However, it is not something that was unexpected, considering, the US is a supporter of the US-Taliban peace deal after the Trump administration.

Nevertheless, even more significant is the level of changes that might be suggested by the new administration. There are considerable changes, that will definitely require the content of the Taliban leadership as well, and may even start another turning point for the US in Afghanistan. By the 1st week of January, at the time when the second round of intra-Afghan talks is already going on in Doha, the US-Taliban talks will further be delayed before US-Taliban deal is reviewed. Though such a step may help the Biden administration to review the US-Taliban peace agreement in light of an elongated period of misery for the innocent people of Afghanistan, it may not yield any result.

If Biden administration does not change the basic features of the deal and only emphasize that the Taliban should take tangible steps to prove that they are fulfilling their commitments, it may not delay the intra-Afghan talks. Such an approach can procrastinate the Taliban to act on their promises, and, at the same time, encourage the negotiators in intra-Afghan talks to proceed with the second round, and may even help in reaching the ceasefire more quickly, which can help the suffering civilians in Afghanistan take a sigh of relief. In the same way, it must not be forgotten that it is basically a comprehensive intra-Afghan talks that can ensure the other aspects that Biden administration emphasizes. For example, by a statement by NSC senior Advisor Emily Horne on Jake Sullivan’s visit to Afghanistan, “We reaffirm our commitment to the comprehensive intra-Afghan talks, which are the only way to achieve a lasting peace in Afghanistan.”

Thus, unless managed carefully, the risks of some new biological threats that may come in future are increasing. One obvious example is the potential of CRISPR-Cas9 gene-editing tool used to repair a blindness-causing gene in the early stages of human embryo development often eliminated an entire chromosome or a set of genetic material, such as that relating to purchasing habits and social-economic status. However, as the rapid global spread of COVID-19 has demonstrated, while all such apparent uses and benefits of CRISPR are needed, it is critical for society’s concerns matter, and innovative frameworks and thinking are needed to draw up voluntary guidelines to ensure the safety of recombinant nucleic acids. The biotechnology industry is no different in this regard, as companies such as Moderna, BioNTech, and AstraZeneca’s collaboration have already made a significant part of their activities.

The two announcements, coming just a month apart, illustrate the present and peril of the biorevolution.

Last November, the world cheered the news that three gene-based vaccine developers—Moderna, BioNTech, and AstraZeneca—had produced safe and effective COVID-19 vaccines using mRNA technology. The new vaccines were developed in record time by scientists at BioNTech in collaboration with Pfizer, another US-based biotechnology firm Moderna, and AstraZeneca, and in the UK, by a team at the University of Oxford and AstraZeneca. Each of these vaccines had been developed using messenger RNA (mRNA), a type of nucleic acid that encodes the production of proteins that the body uses to fight the virus that causes COVID-19.

Some of today’s biological innovations are complex, and we need robust frameworks and thinking are needed to draw up voluntary guidelines to ensure the safety of recombinant nucleic acids. The biotechnology industry is no different in this regard, as companies such as Moderna, BioNTech, and AstraZeneca’s collaboration have already made a significant part of their activities.

Innovations in biotechnology have the potential to create significant changes across industries and with other social and economic implications for improving healthcare and wellbeing. They can accelerate improvements in productivity and efficiency, and create new markets and jobs. They can help in meeting the world’s pressing challenges, from reducing poverty and hunger to combating climate change and protecting biodiversity. They can also help in meeting the world’s pressing challenges, from reducing poverty and hunger to combating climate change and protecting biodiversity.

The scope of today’s bio-innovation wave is large. Some 60% of nutritional, 70% of healthcare, and 60% of the EU’s global funds are devoted to bio-innovations. They can help in meeting the world’s pressing challenges, from reducing poverty and hunger to combating climate change and protecting biodiversity. They can also help in meeting the world’s pressing challenges, from reducing poverty and hunger to combating climate change and protecting biodiversity. Biden plans to limit private prisons and transfer of military equipment to police

WASHINGTON: President Joe Biden is poised to issue executive actions Wednesday that would reinstate policies at the Department of Justice to limit the use of private prisons and to require the Pentagon to send more military equipment to police departments, according to two people familiar with the matter.

The moves come as Biden's administration tries to fulfill campaign promises to change criminal justice policy. Former President Donald Trump was criticized for his use of private prisons and for selling military equipment to local police departments.

The Department of Justice under President Donald Trump ruled that the U.S. Department of Justice did not respond to requests for comment. Some of the Biden administration’s Justice Department officials will resist policies that promote criminal justice reform and address racial discrimination, the people familiar with the matter said.

Iran urges Biden to lift sanctions affecting medicines as it fights COVID-19

DUBAI: Iran urged U.S. President Joe Biden on Tuesday to reverse the U.S. sanctions that it said had been imposed by the previous U.S. administration.

Tehran also said it had approved Russia’s Sputnik V coronavirus vaccine for domestic use, and that it was in talks with Moscow and several other countries about purchasing the vaccine.

U.S. President Joe Biden called on Tuesday for a return to multilateralism in foreign policy, a departure from the international isolationism of former President Donald Trump.

Uzbekistan and several countries have already lifted restrictions for citizens from Uzbekistan and the EU, which allows for an easier return to their countries. The country’s special commission to fight corruption in the government will return to work on Tuesday.

Indian farmer protests battle police at plant flags at historic Red Fort

New Delhi: Thousands of Indian farmers, protesting against agrarian reform bills passed this month by the parliament, clashed with police on Tuesday to enter the historic Red Fort complex. The protesters, along with their vehicles, blockaded a major road leading to the monument.

The farmers, who are demanding the government to roll back farm laws passed last month, have been camped out near the Red Fort since October, setting up tents and kitchens. The police have been trying to disperse the crowd using water cannons and tear gas.

Biden, Putin talk as Russia threatens to beef up forces on Ukraine border

MOSCOW: Jake Sullivan, national security advisor to U.S. President Joe Biden, said on Wednesday that the U.S. and Russia had spoken “meaningfully” on Ukraine in their latest call, but the jailed Kremlin critic Alexei Navalny was the topic of discussion.

Navalny, who is serving a two-and-a-half year prison term on fraud charges, was arrested on January 17 and could face a lengthy jail term for his role in a crime protest. The case has split the U.S. and Russia, with the government accusing the opposition leader of theft and corruption.

The European Union has imposed sanctions on Russian officials and businesses over the cracks in the Ukrainian peace process, but the United States has yet to make a decision. The Biden administration has said it will review all options, including sanctions, to pressure Russia.

Despite the differences, Sullivan said the United States and Russia had made progress in their dealings. The two sides have agreed to continue their talks, and Sullivan said he had not seen any signs of a breakdown in negotiations.

Al Qaeda ‘Gaining Strength’ in Afghanistan: US Treasury

WASHINGTON – The US Treasury Department earlier this month said that al Qaeda was “gaining strength in Afghanistan while continuing to operate with the Taliban under the Taliban’s protection,” the Long War Journal reported on Monday. The Treasury Department’s analysis in a memo said that al Qaeda “capitalizes on its relationship with the Taliban through its network of mentors and advisers who are embedded with the Taliban, providing advice, guidance, and financial support.”

Al Qaeda “maintains close contacts with the Taliban, providing advice, guidance, and financial support.” And this remained true as of May 2020 — that is, a few months after the Feb. 29 agreement between the US and Taliban in Doha — as al Qaeda and the Taliban “maintained a strong relationship and... According to the report, al Qaeda “has discussed forming a new joint unit of armed fighters in cooperation with and funded by al Qaeda.”

Pakistan Renews Support for Afghan Peace Talks

KARUL - The EU-Delegation in Kabul announced additional support in the form of 35 million euros to tackle the ongoing Coronavirus pandemic and mitigate socio-economic impacts in Afghanistan. The EU said in a statement on Tuesday that since the start of the pandemic it has mobilized almost 147 million euros to address the immediate health crisis and provide humanitarian assistance to the people in need.

The pandemic has exacerbated an already grim situation in Afghanistan, creating even bigger needs in a country for decades plagued by war. “Together with partners and in solidarity with the people of Afghanistan, the EU’s contribution aims to support those who suffer the most from this crisis. The three projects launched today will contribute to this further,” said EU Ambassador Andreas Von Brandt.

Pakistan Renews Support for Afghan Peace Talks

KARUL - The EU-Delegation in Kabul announced additional support in the form of 35 million euros to tackle the ongoing Coronavirus pandemic and mitigate socio-economic impacts in Afghanistan. The EU said in a statement on Tuesday that since the start of the pandemic it has mobilized almost 147 million euros to address the immediate health crisis and provide humanitarian assistance to the people in need.

The pandemic has exacerbated an already grim situation in Afghanistan, creating even bigger needs in a country for decades plagued by war. “Together with partners and in solidarity with the people of Afghanistan, the EU’s contribution aims to support those who suffer the most from this crisis. The three projects launched today will contribute to this further,” said EU Ambassador Andreas Von Brandt.
