Terrorist networks have intensified their attacks around the globe, reflecting a escalate in brazen attacks, and non-combatant blasts. The recent surge in global terrorist attacks began on May 22 when Manchester Arena came under terrorist attack. Twenty-six people, mostly women and young girls, were killed and more than 22 others were wounded in the attack. On Oct. 31, 2017, mass shootings fired on a casino convoy carrying officials from Maghagha in Egypt’s Minya Governorate to the Monastery of Saint Samuel the Confessor, killing at least 20 people and injuring 22 others. In April, the Islamic State group bombed two churches in the northern cities of Tanta and Alexandria as Coptic Christians were celebrating Palm Sunday. President Abdel-Fattah el-Sissi declared a three-month state of emergency afterward.

This spike comes as a result of bombings that left 38 people dead and over 60 wounded. Similarly, a night-time attack outside an ice cream shop in the southern neighborhood of Karmiel killed 17 people and wounded 32. Many other deadly attacks occurred in Iraq. On May 31, a suicide car bomb struck the fortified heart of the Afghan capital of Kabul with a massive truck bomb that killed about 150 people, wounded some 430 and raised fears about the government’s ability to protect the government and its military targets.

The bomber drove into Kabul’s heavily guarded diplomatic quarter during the morning rush hour, leaving behind a bloody scene of chaos and destruction in one of the worst attacks since the downfall of foreign forces from Afghanistan in 2014. A series of attacks happened in funeral ceremony, mosques and public places in the holy month of Ramadan in June which filled the air with a strong smell of fear and mistrust. The public protested against the gov- ernment as a result of insecurity that also led to clash between police and the protesters.

What is more disappointing is when the US Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John McCain said that the US had no strategy to end the deadlock in Afghanistan. “After nearly 16 years of war, we are at a stalemate in Afghanistan. How can we say that we are winning when our soldiers are died and over 60 wounded. Similarly, a night-time attack outside an ice cream shop in the southern neighborhood of Karmiel killed 17 people and wounded 32. Many other deadly attacks occurred in Iraq. On May 31, a suicide car bomb struck the fortified heart of the Afghan capital of Kabul with a massive truck bomb that killed about 150 people, wounded some 430 and raised fears about the government’s ability to protect the government and its military targets.

The bomber drove into Kabul’s heavily guarded diplomatic quarter during the morning rush hour, leaving behind a bloody scene of chaos and destruction in one of the worst attacks since the downfall of foreign forces from Afghanistan in 2014. A series of attacks happened in funeral ceremony, mosques and public places in the holy month of Ramadan in June which filled the air with a strong smell of fear and mistrust. The public protested against the government as a result of insecurity that also led to clash between police and the protesters.

What is more disappointing is when the US Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John McCain said that the US had no strategy to end the deadlock in Afghanistan. “After nearly 16 years of war, we are at a stalemate in Afghanistan. How can we say that we are winning when our soldiers are died and over 60 wounded. Similarly, a night-time attack outside an ice cream shop in the southern neighborhood of Karmiel killed 17 people and wounded 32. Many other deadly attacks occurred in Iraq. On May 31, a suicide car bomb struck the fortified heart of the Afghan capital of Kabul with a massive truck bomb that killed about 150 people, wounded some 430 and raised fears about the government’s ability to protect the government and its military targets.

The bomber drove into Kabul’s heavily guarded diplomatic quarter during the morning rush hour, leaving behind a bloody scene of chaos and destruction in one of the worst attacks since the downfall of foreign forces from Afghanistan in 2014. A series of attacks happened in funeral ceremony, mosques and public places in the holy month of Ramadan in June which filled the air with a strong smell of fear and mistrust. The public protested against the government as a result of insecurity that also led to clash between police and the protesters.

What is more disappointing is when the US Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John McCain said that the US had no strategy to end the deadlock in Afghanistan. “After nearly 16 years of war, we are at a stalemate in Afghanistan. How can we say that we are winning when our soldiers are died and over 60 wounded. Similarly, a night-time attack outside an ice cream shop in the southern neighborhood of Karmiel killed 17 people and wounded 32. Many other deadly attacks occurred in Iraq. On May 31, a suicide car bomb struck the fortified heart of the Afghan capital of Kabul with a massive truck bomb that killed about 150 people, wounded some 430 and raised fears about the government’s ability to protect the government and its military targets.

The bomber drove into Kabul’s heavily guarded diplomatic quarter during the morning rush hour, leaving behind a bloody scene of chaos and destruction in one of the worst attacks since the downfall of foreign forces from Afghanistan in 2014. A series of attacks happened in funeral ceremony, mosques and public places in the holy month of Ramadan in June which filled the air with a strong smell of fear and mistrust. The public protested against the government as a result of insecurity that also led to clash between police and the protesters.

What is more disappointing is when the US Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John McCain said that the US had no strategy to end the deadlock in Afghanistan. “After nearly 16 years of war, we are at a stalemate in Afghanistan. How can we say that we are winning when our soldiers are died and over 60 wounded. Similarly, a night-time attack outside an ice cream shop in the southern neighborhood of Karmiel killed 17 people and wounded 32. Many other deadly attacks occurred in Iraq. On May 31, a suicide car bomb struck the fortified heart of the Afghan capital of Kabul with a massive truck bomb that killed about 150 people, wounded some 430 and raised fears about the government’s ability to protect the government and its military targets.

The bomber drove into Kabul’s heavily guarded diplomatic quarter during the morning rush hour, leaving behind a bloody scene of chaos and destruction in one of the worst attacks since the downfall of foreign forces from Afghanistan in 2014. A series of attacks happened in funeral ceremony, mosques and public places in the holy month of Ramadan in June which filled the air with a strong smell of fear and mistrust. The public protested against the government as a result of insecurity that also led to clash between police and the protesters.

What is more disappointing is when the US Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John McCain said that the US had no strategy to end the deadlock in Afghanistan. “After nearly 16 years of war, we are at a stalemate in Afghanistan. How can we say that we are winning when our soldiers are died and over 60 wounded. Similarly, a night-time attack outside an ice cream shop in the southern neighborhood of Karmiel killed 17 people and wounded 32. Many other deadly attacks occurred in Iraq. On May 31, a suicide car bomb struck the fortified heart of the Afghan capital of Kabul with a massive truck bomb that killed about 150 people, wounded some 430 and raised fears about the government’s ability to protect the government and its military targets.

The bomber drove into Kabul’s heavily guarded diplomatic quarter during the morning rush hour, leaving behind a bloody scene of chaos and destruction in one of the worst attacks since the downfall of foreign forces from Afghanistan in 2014. A series of attacks happened in funeral ceremony, mosques and public places in the holy month of Ramadan in June which filled the air with a strong smell of fear and mistrust. The public protested against the government as a result of insecurity that also led to clash between police and the protesters.