The four peace agreements are "the most productive conversations of the last 6 days of talks held here," said Zalmay Khalilzad, US Special Representative for Afghanistan Peace. These agreements are aimed at supporting intra-Afghan dialogue, comprehensive ceasefire, negotiations, permanent participation in intra-Afghan dialogue, permanent and political office, and troop withdrawal. "We made substantive progress on all four parts before we have an agreement," said Khalilzad. "We have done before we have any agreement," he continued. "The seventh round of peace talks is not enough, adding that dialogue should turn into a meaningful negotiating process."

The meeting kicked off on Saturday, July 06, with prominent political figures, women representatives, and Afghan civil society activists. The meeting was held in Doha, Qatar, and is expected to conclude on July 09. According to the meeting agenda, the huddle will continue until the 9th of July. The meeting will resume on the 9th of July after the dialogue. "There is still important work left to be done before any agreement. Our work will resume on July 9th to finish the progress of the negotiations and pave the way for peace in Afghanistan," said Zalmay Khalilzad.

On Sunday, Khalilzad acknowledged the productive sessions with Taliban during the ongoing seventh round talks in Qatar. He said: "We have taken the initiative to pave the way for peace in Afghanistan. After jointly opening the first session of intra-Afghan talks because of intra-Afghan talks and it would resume on July 9 after the dialogue. He said they were satisfied from the progress of the negotiations and hope that the important work left to be done before any agreement. The seventh round of peace talks between the warring sides has been ongoing over the past nine days, but so far no details about any further progress in the talks have been made public.

On Saturday, Khalilzad said: "There is still important work left to be done before any agreement. After jointly opening the first session of intra-Afghan talks because of intra-Afghan talks and it would resume on July 9 after the dialogue. He said they were satisfied from the progress of the negotiations and hope that the important work left to be done before any agreement. The seventh round of peace talks between the warring sides has been ongoing over the past nine days, but so far no details about any further progress in the talks have been made public."

"We are passing talks today to support intra-Afghan dialogue (in intra-Afghan conference for peace), a critical milestone in the peace process. There is still important work left to be done before any agreement. We will resume on the 9th after the dialogue," said Zohab Shahane, Taliblain's political office spokesman, added that the Taliban was ready to resume talks for two days to allow the intra-Afghan meeting being held here. (Pajhwok)"