Who Wins and Loses From Eid Ceasefire Deal?

A n unusual ceasefire for the Eid was announced by the Ashraf Ghan, the Afghan President, Thursday, July 7 last week, and in a move not the Taliban announced a 3-day ceasefire during the Eid Hil, for Saturday, this week, but they excluded the international forces from the ceasefire.

In this context, it is the first time the Afghan Taliban accept a ceasefire initiated by the Afghan government, since it has gone up when the Taliban regime was toppled by the international community and the United national Front in 2001.

The deal is unique in itself, it was announced by the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, an institution many analysts see it as a strategic cooperation platform among the major Eurasian countries including India and Pakistan.

Many political analysts see the war in Afghanistan as a proxy war between regional powers, including India and Pakistan. And political analysts say the war in Afghanistan as a proxy war between regional powers, including India and Pakistan.

The deal is unique in itself, it was announced by the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, an institution many analysts see it as a strategic cooperation platform among the major Eurasian countries including India and Pakistan. And political analysts say the war in Afghanistan as a proxy war between regional powers, including India and Pakistan.

The deal is unique in itself, it was announced by the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, an institution many analysts see it as a strategic cooperation platform among the major Eurasian countries including India and Pakistan.

The deal is unique in itself, it was announced by the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, an institution many analysts see it as a strategic cooperation platform among the major Eurasian countries including India and Pakistan.

The deal is unique in itself, it was announced by the Shanghai Cooperation Organization, an institution many analysts see it as a strategic cooperation platform among the major Eurasian countries including India and Pakistan.