Afgan women played a highly significant role in social, political, and economic arenas and continue their active participation in all these sectors being either entirely equal or less in number, while in the case of Afghans, women do not support their male counterparts in collective life, the role of women should not be considered in elections both as voters and candidates, in schools and universities. Meanwhile, Afghan women have to take more active role for greater role of women and empower them further. The historical role of women should not be considered in the light of end of Afghanistan’s internal insurrections that stems from variety of political, regional, and historical account and the external factors that either constitute or underwrite the stability. There are some positive signs of a breakthrough in the stalled peace process in which the Taliban and the Afghan government have agreed to engage in talks aimed at ending the violence. The third issue for the Osaka summit is the importance of innovation in tackling global environmental challenges. The goal outlined in the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) report is a global temperature rise of 1.5°C above pre-industrial levels. The message on the back appeared in white in skillfully written Japanese. "If you want to protect the environment, you must start from the Indus. All Japan are continuing to move forward, exchanging with other countries around the world. That positive attitude was a way of life for the generations of postwar Japanese who brought about our rapid economic growth. By the 1980’s, that attitude was replaced by another, more regulatory, more control-oriented attitude. It’s a good place to start. The great supply chains driving the global economy for many years now are anchored in the ASEAN region. The region’s economies have benefited from the fact that they are not so large and they are not so diverse. It is precisely this freedom that accounts for ASEAN’s dynamism and growing prosperity. However, the growth of the region has also created new challenges for the region. The Belt and Road has been anchored in the ASEAN region, and the growth of the region has also created new challenges for the region.
