French President Emmanuel Macron was in Afghanistan on Tuesday to offer condolences to President Ashraf Ghani, who lost 16 people in a suicide attack on a presidential official’s residence.

The president’s trip comes as a powerful French delegation visits the region to discuss ways in which the two countries can cooperate in the fight against terrorism.

The French delegation, which includes foreign minister Jean-Yves Le Drian, is expected to discuss the situation in Afghanistan, including the fight against terrorism, and how the two countries can work together to promote peace and security.

Mr. Macron met with President Ghani and other Afghan leaders to discuss ways in which the French government can contribute to the ongoing efforts to bring an end to the conflict in Afghanistan.

The French delegation also visited the scene of the attack, which took place in Kabul on Monday, and met with families of the victims.

Mr. Macron said he was deeply moved by the courage and resilience of the Afghan people.

In a statement, he said: “I want to express my condolences to the families of the victims and the Afghan people. My thoughts are with them in this time of sadness and loss.”

Mr. Macron also expressed his support for the Afghan government and its efforts to bring an end to the conflict.

He added: “I want to convey my support for the Afghan government and its efforts to bring an end to the conflict, and to the Afghan people who continue to suffer.”

The French delegation will hold discussions with Afghan leaders on a range of issues, including the situation in Afghanistan, the fight against terrorism, and the international community’s efforts to bring an end to the conflict.

Mr. Macron said he would also discuss with Afghan leaders the role of the international community in supporting the Afghan government and its efforts to bring an end to the conflict.

He added: “I will discuss with Afghan leaders the role of the international community in supporting the Afghan government and its efforts to bring an end to the conflict.”

The French delegation is expected to return to Paris on Wednesday.
