CHRITCHBUC - New Zealand Prime Minister Jacinda Ardern announced on Monday a royal commission inquiry into the events leading up to March 15 attacks on two mosques in Christchurch that killed 50 people, including an event’s intelligence services.

“It is important that no stone is left unturned to get to the bottom of how this act of terrorism occurred and what, if any, opportunities we had to stop it,” Ardern told reporters at Parliament House in the capital, Wellington.

She said a royal commission, which has independent inquiries and are usually reserved for matters of the greatest public importance, was an appropriate response to the attack. Thousands gathered in New Zealand’s cities on Sunday to protest racism and remember the 50 Muslims killed by a gunman in Christchurch and as Prime Minister Jacinda Ardern announced a national remembrance service to be held later this year. About 15,000 turned out for an evening vigil in Christchurch in a park near the Al Noor mosque, where a suspect with a semi-automatic rifle killed more than 40 of the victims. Several more people were killed at the nearby Linwood mosque.

Many non-Muslim women wore headscarves at the vigil, some made by members of Christchurch’s Muslim community. They showed their respect for those of Islamic faith as they held the vigil. Ardern said speaking at the vigil. “The service will be a chance to once again show that New Zealanders are compassionate, inclusive and diverse, and that we will protect those values,” Ardern said in a statement. The prime minister has praised for her leadership. (More on Pk-6, D)
