Fighting inequality in Asia and the Pacific

By Samshad Akhlar

Inequality is increasing in Asia and the Pacific. Our region’s remarkable economic success story has a widening gap between rich and poor. A Shriver Foundation report shows that economic inequality is growing in the region and our ambition to achieve sustainable development is compromised unless measures are taken to address this problem. The report highlights the need for policies that can reduce inequality and increase social mobility.

The report finds that the region is experiencing increasing income inequality. This is partly due to the rise in income disparities and the widening gap between the rich and the poor. The report also highlights the need for government to take effective measures to reduce income inequality and promote social mobility.

In order to achieve sustainable development, it is crucial to address income inequality. This requires government to take effective measures to reduce income disparities and increase social mobility. The report suggests that government should focus on policies that can reduce income inequality and promote social mobility.
