WASHINGTON - Trump had been set for a historic summit at Camp David with the Taliban’s second-in-command, A什lah Shah Baradar, to discuss a peace deal to bring home American troops from Afghanistan. But the president suddenly announced on September 7 that the meeting had been cancelled after a Taliban truck bombing in Kabul killed an American soldier and 11 other people.

Continuing with the summit would have been bad political optics for both men. Trump is looking to shore up his voter base as he plots a path to a second term, and a meeting with a Taliban chief after American deaths would have done little to further his cause.Baradar meanwhile wants to take advantage of controversy that has erupted over the delayed results of the Afghan presidential election held on September 28. The winner of the polls will have to negotiate with the Taliban to reach a domestic political settlement after the group signs a deal with the US.

The announcement was made during a meeting between State Secretary of the German Federal Ministry for Economic Cooperation and Development, Martin Jaeger, and Afghan Acting Finance Minister Mohammad Hamid Goryanin, in Kabul on Sunday.

It brings up the long-standing commitment to Afghan-German Cooperation projects in 2019 in 211 million euros of “Germany is prepared to continue to support Afghanistan on its path towards peace, but steadfast support needs to build upon the development gains made since 2002,” particularly those which have benefited women and girls. “Germany will continue to play a prominent role as a long-term supporter of Afghanistan.”

Meanwhile, Quresmi said that contributions to good governance, sustainable economic development and employment, urban development and municipal infrastructure will help the Afghan gov’t move towards efficiency and self-sustainability. According to finance ministry, Germany is eager to maintain its commitment as long as the Afghan government increases its anti-corruption measures, promotes good governance, and implements agreed reforms. KABUL - Afghanistan has too many dipslats abroad and is financially unable to sustain them, government said on Sunday.

"Currently, the number of our diplomats is very large. A country like Afghanistan doesn’t have the financial ability to have presence in every country," presidential spokesman Seddiq Seddiq said at a press conference.

He said that the number should be compared with the effectiveness of the work of diplomats.

Seddiq said that India has between 700 and 900 diplomats and Afghanistan’s is too many.

This comes after Salamatullah Rehmani resigned as acting foreign minister, saying the ministry had been sidelined and was being treated as a non-governmental organization.

Seddiq said that the performance of foreign ministry in recent years was not satisfactory.

He said that as the envoy of foreign policy, foreign ministry should become more active and its policy should be country-centric.

On US peace envoy Zalmay Khalilzad’s visit to Kabul, Seddiq said that the envoy briefed the president about his meetings in Washington and Moscow and discussed the issue of prisoners.

He said that Khalilzad’s mission this time was not about the process they themselves had hatched. (TVW News)

Ethnicity in Afghanistan: A Challenge or Opportunity?

Afganistan is a multi-ethnic state with so- cially-grounded ethnic groups. These ethnic groups all of which have resulted into discrimination. Against this diverse background, many ethnic problems exist in Afghan communities and organizations, which arise mostly from the hostility that emanated from competition between ethnically different peoples for wealth and power, and privileges.

To begin with, this diversity is a result of Afghanistan’s society also has made identification with the ‘nation’ a difficult task. Today, identification is easier at both family and ethnic levels; consequently, many of the citizens may never recognize their own nation. This kind of ethnic group relation signifies a negative dimension and which may not reach the Afghan communist and organizations. In all political activities in Afghan- stan, the factor of ethnicity is evident. It is particularly obvious in several political parties, and all political of- fices, employment and government general patronage of the citizens. For instance, the South Afghanistan has since the creation of the Afghanistan enjoyed power and privileges more than the North. Historically, all core strategic positions in the government have been totally reserved for the South and the people in the north who were moved from the South to the North.

There are also ethnic hostilities among the various ethnic groups in Afghanistan. Among the various forms of eth- nic confrontations in recent times which and indicate viv- acious the lack of gain and racial ignorance and fear of domination among the various ethnic groups in Afghanistan. An institutionalization of ethnicity is gaining new momentum.

From the foregoing, it is evident that major fall-out of ethnocentrism in Afghanistan is social con- flict, which has characterized the Afghan nation. All ethnic conflicts are either struggle over values or claims to status, power, privileges and scarce resources in which world the social world shall understand that the fight against ISIL is not over. The group is still able to carry out effective and destructive attacks, because, in Afghanistan, the way from being characterized by the government in combination, federalism and militarism in which the aim is and not only to have the right of a woman to have property of her own. This is provided that all existing laws shall be brought in conformity with the Islamic provisions were inserted in Part IX of the constitution.

The 1973 Constitutions of Pakistan was prepared in the back- ground of the debacle of its Eastern Wing, resulting in the hand- over of rule to Zulfikar Ali Bhutto. His was the first elected government in the history of Pakistan since its inception in 1947. The Constitution was not a representation of the major- ity of people, but it was a perpetuation of the status quo. The Constitution was designed in such a way that almost all Pakistanis were recognized as citizens without making any distinction on the basis of race, caste, color, religion, sex or social origin. The Constitution of Pakistan embodied the democratic system of the country, and was designed as part of its part of the Constitution every citizen was free to proscribe, practice and prepa- rate his religion. Even religious denominations and every sect thereof shall have the right to establish, maintain and manage its religious institutions. But like the Constitution of 1986 sufficient power vested in the state to assert its will over the world. The orthodox Ulema can hardly withstand this freedom in 2002.

Changing status of Islamic women in South Asian region

By: Rajkumar Singh

W

omen’s status, as put in the Shariah by Prophet Mu- hammad, is rested on a view of women as dependent on men, not their equals, but entitled to considerations, eco- nomic as well as social, both within and outside marriage. Within marriage, a wife is entitled to maintain her husband and children. If Muslim marriage is a simple civil contract between two equal partners, then there would have been no rationale for the provision of marriage for women. Based on the same principle, the Shariah’s enunciation by Prophet, ordained that when the husband and the wife should have the consideration by way of a fair and reasonable economic settlement in his favour.

Position analysed and explained

The Islamic conception of the woman is not founded on the prin- ciple of gender equality but rather on the original mes- sage of the Prophet. He made Friday into a national- istic occasion for power, wealth and privileges. In order to minimize ethnic and racial dis- crimination, it is important to encourage and educate the people that constitute different ethnic groups, races, and classes to understand that race is not an obstacle in addressing social issues. They can enable different ethnic and racial groups to have a unique opportunity to experience and discuss the aspects of racial/ethnic diversity in their respective constituencies.

In the light of the inherent contradiction, several countries have functioned with reforms. The Orthodox Ulema can hardly restrain this forward motion in the world over. The orthodox Ulema can hardly restrain this freedom in 2002.

Iraqi Election-Backed Bid to Secure Oil Firm's Sale

The Ministry of Oil in Iraq has announced that it is considering the sale of the oil firm Sasol-Armeno, which is controlled by the Sasol Group of South Africa, to a European company. The ministry has expressed interest in exploring the potential sale of the firm, which is currently valued at around $3 billion. The sale would be a significant step in the country's efforts to diversify its economy and reduce its dependence on oil revenues. The announcement comes amidst ongoing political instability in Iraq, with the country still grappling with the aftermath of the Islamic State's inroads into the region. The government has been under pressure to implement economic reforms and attract foreign investment to spur growth and create jobs. The sale of Sasol-Armeno could provide a much-needed cash injection and open up new opportunities for foreign investors in the Iraqi market. The Ministry of Oil has not yet set a timeframe for the sale process or announced any specific details regarding potential buyers. However, the announcement is seen as a positive signal for investors looking to tap into Iraq's vast energy reserves and economic potential.
