Trump’s Election as US President and Effects on Afghanistan

T he much-hyped United States (US) Presidential Election ended on November 9, 2016, and Donald Trump, the Republican candidate, was elected America’s 45th president. The election result was unexpected for many, with US opinion polls showing Hillary Clinton, the Democratic candidate, might win. However, the things turned in Trump’s way and the people of the United States of America chose him as their chief. In the process, Trump had to go through many controversies and allegations but kept on his campaign like a true warrior. Now that Trump has been elected as the US president, this will end the democratic. There are concerns that lasted for eight years and there are expectations that there will be certain drastic changes. In his experiences, the US and the UN set up various policies, but most of them are based on the politics of appeasement, retribution, and self-interest. The US will not show any kind of softness in its policies, and US President Donald Trump has said that he would not support any side, and US relations are not on the basis of political favors. Today, the US is faced with some serious challenges and threats in different fields.

By Mark Leonard

A lone again, since World War II, Europe has looked at the US through a transatlantic lens. There have been ups and downs in the alliance with the United States, but it was a family relationship built on two-way commitments. There would be no America for Trump, or for the US, without Europe. No one can lose Europe’s support. It is crucial for Trump to get Europe on board. He would have no Europe, no US-EU relationship.

As US President, Trump will have to look at the world through different eyes. There are four major areas that need to be addressed: American guarantees, global institutions, human rights, and Afghanistan. Trump has said that he will put the “Art of the Deal” into practice. He has a revisionist agenda for almost all of these bodies, from the UN to NATO.

By Hujjattullah Zia

H uman rights will be practiced in democratic societies, where the individuals tolerate one another irrespective of race, creed, or religion. In democratic societies, one will be able to experience their fundamental rights without being subjected to a single obstacle and will not matter what ideology one has in the society. All of the individuals’ beliefs and ideologies will be problematic neither in social nor in individual life. On the contrary, there will be no room for democracy in closed societies and men’s rights in liberty, property and freedom will be violated in one way or another. Closed societies are believed to share citizens with closed mind and people lack tolerance. In this society, one’s freedom is constrained in the name of democracy, creed or color. Wherever one is not treated on the grounds of being human, serious challenges will emerge and that nation will suffer from violence and instability. Donald Trump’s election in America, his policies and rhetoric towards the nation are a source of concern.

November 10, 2016

Trump’s Election as US President and Effects on Afghanistan

The much-hyped United States (US) Presidential Election ended on November 9, 2016, and Donald Trump, the Republican candidate, was elected America’s 45th president. The election result was unexpected for many, with US opinion polls showing Hillary Clinton, the Democratic candidate, might win. However, the things turned in Trump’s way and the people of the United States of America chose him as their chief. In the process, Trump had to go through many controversies and allegations but kept on his campaign like a true warrior. Now that Trump has been elected as the US president, this will end the democratic. There are concerns that lasted for eight years and there are expectations that there will be certain drastic changes. In his experiences, the US and the UN set up various policies, but most of them are based on the politics of appeasement, retribution, and self-interest. The US will not show any kind of softness in its policies, and US President Donald Trump has said that he would not support any side, and US relations are not on the basis of political favors. Today, the US is faced with some serious challenges and threats in different fields.

By Mark Leonard

A lone again, since World War II, Europe has looked at the US through a transatlantic lens. There have been ups and downs in the alliance with the United States, but it was a family relationship built on two-way commitments. There would be no America for Trump, or for the US, without Europe. No one can lose Europe’s support. It is crucial for Trump to get Europe on board. He would have no Europe, no US-EU relationship.

As US President, Trump will have to look at the world through different eyes. There are four major areas that need to be addressed: American guarantees, global institutions, human rights, and Afghanistan. Trump has said that he will put the “Art of the Deal” into practice. He has a revisionist agenda for almost all of these bodies, from the UN to NATO.

By Hujjattullah Zia

H uman rights will be practiced in democratic societies, where the individuals tolerate one another irrespective of race, creed, or religion. In democratic societies, one will be able to experience their fundamental rights without being subjected to a single obstacle and will not matter what ideology one has in the society. All of the individuals’ beliefs and ideologies will be problematic neither in social nor in individual life. On the contrary, there will be no room for democracy in closed societies and men’s rights in liberty, property and freedom will be violated in one way or another. Closed societies are believed to share citizens with closed mind and people lack tolerance. In this society, one’s freedom is constrained in the name of democracy, creed or color. Wherever one is not treated on the grounds of being human, serious challenges will emerge and that nation will suffer from violence and instability. Donald Trump’s election in America, his policies and rhetoric towards the nation are a source of concern.