President David Cameron was scheduled to attend the.

"The fight against extremism is something that affects each one of us. This is the struggle of all of us together," he said.

As part of British government's new approach to counter extremism, Cameron has announced that he was sending 1,000 British troops to join the Free Syrian Army, which is considered the most effective insurgent group fighting against the Syrian government.

The announcement comes after Russian strikes in Syria have raised concerns about the potential for increased violence in the region.

"We are committed to supporting the efforts of the Free Syrian Army," Cameron said.

The British government has been increasing its support for the Syrian opposition in recent months, despite a lack of consensus among Western powers on how to best intervene in the conflict.

"We will continue to support the Syrian people in their fight for democracy and freedom," Cameron said.

The British government has already provided military aid and training to the Syrian opposition.

Cameron's announcement is likely to be welcomed by some, who see it as a necessary step to prevent a wider conflict in the region.

However, it is likely to be met with opposition from others, who argue that military intervention will only lead to more violence and instability.

The situation in Syria is complex and volatile, with regional and international actors all having a stake in the outcome.

The British government's new approach to counter extremism will be closely watched by other countries, as they consider their own strategies for dealing with the threat of terrorism.

Cameron's statement comes as the United States and Russia are at odds over how to best intervene in the conflict.

The United States has been pushing for a military intervention, while Russia has been supporting the Syrian government.

The situation in Syria is likely to remain tense in the coming months, with both sides preparing for a possible military confrontation.

"We will continue to support the Syrian people in their fight for democracy and freedom," Cameron said.

The British government has already provided military aid and training to the Syrian opposition.

Cameron's announcement is likely to be welcomed by some, who see it as a necessary step to prevent a wider conflict in the region.

However, it is likely to be met with opposition from others, who argue that military intervention will only lead to more violence and instability.

The situation in Syria is complex and volatile, with regional and international actors all having a stake in the outcome.

The British government's new approach to counter extremism will be closely watched by other countries, as they consider their own strategies for dealing with the threat of terrorism.

Cameron's statement comes as the United States and Russia are at odds over how to best intervene in the conflict.

The United States has been pushing for a military intervention, while Russia has been supporting the Syrian government.

The situation in Syria is likely to remain tense in the coming months, with both sides preparing for a possible military confrontation.

Cameron's statement comes as the United States and Russia are at odds over how to best intervene in the conflict.

The United States has been pushing for a military intervention, while Russia has been supporting the Syrian government.

The situation in Syria is likely to remain tense in the coming months, with both sides preparing for a possible military confrontation.