KABUL - The Pentagon has asked US lawmakers that it needed additional $11.6 billion to pay for the campaign against Islamic State (IS) militants and the war in Afghanistan. The request raised the price for both wars to $85.3 billion in 2017.

Some $5.6 billion would go toward military operations against ISIS in Iraq and Syria. The U.S. has been carrying out the bulk of the coalition airstrikes, and has been training and advising Iraqi security forces, the statement said.

Some of the funding would also help support the Afghan National Defense and Security Forces. Carter said the money funded initiatives “that will hasten the defeat of ISIS.” Additional resources will help sustain that positive momentum by boosting our support to partner forces and our intelligence efforts,” he said. In addition to enhancing our effort to defeat ISIL, this plan would fund the President’s decision to adjust our troop levels in order to better support the Afghan government’s strategy to secure its nation, and would help enhance Afghanistan’s aviation capability.

Another $5.8 billion would go to the State Department and USAID for counter-terrorism objectives, including the efforts to implement the diplomatic, engagement, governance, and stabilization components of [the] Administration’s counter-isis. Additional resources would help enhance Afghanistan’s diplomatic engagement, governance, and stabilization components of [the] Administration’s counter-isis and USAID for “counter-terrorism and counterterrorism efforts.” Another $3.2 billion would go to the Defense Department and the intelligence communities to carry out the Administration’s counter-ISIL, counter-isis, and counterterrorism efforts.

Congress Urged to Approve
$11.6 for ISIS Fight, Afghanistan

KABUL - The Pentagon has asked US lawmakers that it needed additional $11.6 billion to pay for the campaign against Islamic State (IS) militants and the war in Afghanistan. The request raised the price for both wars to $85.3 billion in 2017.

Some $5.6 billion would go toward military operations against ISIS in Iraq and Syria. The U.S. has been carrying out the bulk of the coalition airstrikes, and has been training and advising Iraqi security forces, the statement said.

Some of the funding would also help support the Afghan National Defense and Security Forces. Carter said the money funded initiatives “that will hasten the defeat of ISIS.” Additional resources will help sustain that positive momentum by boosting our support to partner forces and our intelligence efforts,” he said. In addition to enhancing our effort to defeat ISIL, this plan would fund the President’s decision to adjust our troop levels in order to better support the Afghan government’s strategy to secure its nation, and would help enhance Afghanistan’s aviation capability.

Another $5.8 billion would go to the State Department and USAID for counter-terrorism objectives, including the efforts to implement the diplomatic, engagement, governance, and stabilization components of [the] Administration’s counter-isis. Additional resources would help enhance Afghanistan’s diplomatic engagement, governance, and stabilization components of [the] Administration’s counter-isis and USAID for “counter-terrorism and counterterrorism efforts.” Another $3.2 billion would go to the Defense Department and the intelligence communities to carry out the Administration’s counter-ISIL, counter-isis, and counterterrorism efforts.

KABUL - The Selection Committee on Thursday unveiled the final list of 15 nominees as members-designate for the Independent Election Commission (IEC) and 21 for the Independent Election Commission (IECC).

The committee began selecting commissioners on the two electoral bodies as part of the electoral reform on November 2 and completed the selection list on Wednesday.

Afghanistan May Have to Accommodate 1.5 Million Refugees in 2016

KABUL - The Pentagon has asked US lawmakers that it needed additional $11.6 billion to pay for the campaign against Islamic State (IS) militants and the war in Afghanistan. The request raised the price for both wars to $85.3 billion in 2017.

Some $5.6 billion would go toward military operations against ISIS in Iraq and Syria. The U.S. has been carrying out the bulk of the coalition airstrikes, and has been training and advising Iraqi security forces, the statement said.

Some of the funding would also help support the Afghan National Defense and Security Forces. Carter said the money funded initiatives “that will hasten the defeat of ISIS.” Additional resources will help sustain that positive momentum by boosting our support to partner forces and our intelligence efforts,” he said. In addition to enhancing our effort to defeat ISIL, this plan would fund the President’s decision to adjust our troop levels in order to better support the Afghan government’s strategy to secure its nation, and would help enhance Afghanistan’s aviation capability.

Another $5.8 billion would go to the State Department and USAID for counter-terrorism objectives, including the efforts to implement the diplomatic, engagement, governance, and stabilization components of [the] Administration’s counter-isis. Additional resources would help enhance Afghanistan’s diplomatic engagement, governance, and stabilization components of [the] Administration’s counter-isis and USAID for “counter-terrorism and counterterrorism efforts.” Another $3.2 billion would go to the Defense Department and the intelligence communities to carry out the Administration’s counter-ISIL, counter-isis, and counterterrorism efforts.

KABUL - The Selection Committee on Thursday unveiled the final list of 15 nominees as members-designate for the Independent Election Commission (IEC) and 21 for the Independent Election Commission (IECC).

The committee began selecting commissioners on the two electoral bodies as part of the electoral reform on November 2 and completed the selection list on Wednesday.

Afghanistan May Have to Accommodate 1.5 Million Refugees in 2016

KABUL - The Pentagon has asked US lawmakers that it needed additional $11.6 billion to pay for the campaign against Islamic State (IS) militants and the war in Afghanistan. The request raised the price for both wars to $85.3 billion in 2017.

Some $5.6 billion would go toward military operations against ISIS in Iraq and Syria. The U.S. has been carrying out the bulk of the coalition airstrikes, and has been training and advising Iraqi security forces, the statement said.

Some of the funding would also help support the Afghan National Defense and Security Forces. Carter said the money funded initiatives “that will hasten the defeat of ISIS.” Additional resources will help sustain that positive momentum by boosting our support to partner forces and our intelligence efforts,” he said. In addition to enhancing our effort to defeat ISIL, this plan would fund the President’s decision to adjust our troop levels in order to better support the Afghan government’s strategy to secure its nation, and would help enhance Afghanistan’s aviation capability.

Another $5.8 billion would go to the State Department and USAID for counter-terrorism objectives, including the efforts to implement the diplomatic, engagement, governance, and stabilization components of [the] Administration’s counter-isis. Additional resources would help enhance Afghanistan’s diplomatic engagement, governance, and stabilization components of [the] Administration’s counter-isis and USAID for “counter-terrorism and counterterrorism efforts.” Another $3.2 billion would go to the Defense Department and the intelligence communities to carry out the Administration’s counter-ISIL, counter-isis, and counterterrorism efforts.

KABUL - The Selection Committee on Thursday unveiled the final list of 15 nominees as members-designate for the Independent Election Commission (IEC) and 21 for the Independent Election Commission (IECC).

The committee began selecting commissioners on the two electoral bodies as part of the electoral reform on November 2 and completed the selection list on Wednesday.

Afghanistan May Have to Accommodate 1.5 Million Refugees in 2016

KABUL - The Pentagon has asked US lawmakers that it needed additional $11.6 billion to pay for the campaign against Islamic State (IS) militants and the war in Afghanistan. The request raised the price for both wars to $85.3 billion in 2017.

Some $5.6 billion would go toward military operations against ISIS in Iraq and Syria. The U.S. has been carrying out the bulk of the coalition airstrikes, and has been training and advising Iraqi security forces, the statement said.

Some of the funding would also help support the Afghan National Defense and Security Forces. Carter said the money funded initiatives “that will hasten the defeat of ISIS.” Additional resources will help sustain that positive momentum by boosting our support to partner forces and our intelligence efforts,” he said. In addition to enhancing our effort to defeat ISIL, this plan would fund the President’s decision to adjust our troop levels in order to better support the Afghan government’s strategy to secure its nation, and would help enhance Afghanistan’s aviation capability.

Another $5.8 billion would go to the State Department and USAID for counter-terrorism objectives, including the efforts to implement the diplomatic, engagement, governance, and stabilization components of [the] Administration’s counter-isis. Additional resources would help enhance Afghanistan’s diplomatic engagement, governance, and stabilization components of [the] Administration’s counter-isis and USAID for “counter-terrorism and counterterrorism efforts.” Another $3.2 billion would go to the Defense Department and the intelligence communities to carry out the Administration’s counter-ISIL, counter-isis, and counterterrorism efforts.

KABUL - The Selection Committee on Thursday unveiled the final list of 15 nominees as members-designate for the Independent Election Commission (IEC) and 21 for the Independent Election Commission (IECC).

The committee began selecting commissioners on the two electoral bodies as part of the electoral reform on November 2 and completed the selection list on Wednesday.

Afghanistan May Have to Accommodate 1.5 Million Refugees in 2016

KABUL - The Pentagon has asked US lawmakers that it needed additional $11.6 billion to pay for the campaign against Islamic State (IS) militants and the war in Afghanistan. The request raised the price for both wars to $85.3 billion in 2017.

Some $5.6 billion would go toward military operations against ISIS in Iraq and Syria. The U.S. has been carrying out the bulk of the coalition airstrikes, and has been training and advising Iraqi security forces, the statement said.

Some of the funding would also help support the Afghan National Defense and Security Forces. Carter said the money funded initiatives “that will hasten the defeat of ISIS.” Additional resources will help sustain that positive momentum by boosting our support to partner forces and our intelligence efforts,” he said. In addition to enhancing our effort to defeat ISIL, this plan would fund the President’s decision to adjust our troop levels in order to better support the Afghan government’s strategy to secure its nation, and would help enhance Afghanistan’s aviation capability.

Another $5.8 billion would go to the State Department and USAID for counter-terrorism objectives, including the efforts to implement the diplomatic, engagement, governance, and stabilization components of [the] Administration’s counter-isis. Additional resources would help enhance Afghanistan’s diplomatic engagement, governance, and stabilization components of [the] Administration’s counter-isis and USAID for “counter-terrorism and counterterrorism efforts.” Another $3.2 billion would go to the Defense Department and the intelligence communities to carry out the Administration’s counter-ISIL, counter-isis, and counterterrorism efforts.