Khorshid, noted journalist, said the minister had overstepped his limit by acting as an enforcer of virtues through his administrative activities.

Khorshid said the minister had a “moral fixation” on his job and was always on the lookout for wrongdoing. He warned that the minister’s actions could lead to the destruction of the government’s image.

The minister was accused of acting as an enforcer of virtues in the public sector, which was seen as a violation of the civil service’s professionalism and autonomy.

Khorshid called on the government to take action against the minister’s excesses and ensure that the civil service operates within the boundaries of the law.

A journalist in the government’s media department said the minister’s actions were not uncommon and that they were tolerated because of the government’s need for order and discipline.

He added that the civil service was under pressure to maintain the government’s image, which often led to the overstepping of boundaries.

The journalist called on the government to take action against the minister and ensure that the civil service operates within the boundaries of the law.

Meanwhile, a number of civil society activists said no director of other departments besides the Hajj and Islamic affairs departments of 10 provinces were re-appointed in near future.

He said posts of Hajj and Islamic, who were from Khost, were not re-appointed for the betterment actions of the department.

The activists said the minister has been heading the Hajj and Islamic Affairs Department of Southeast from 2012.

The activists said that the minister had a long record of mismanagement and corruption.

One of them said that when the minister was appointed, the performance of the department improved, but later it declined.

He said the minister had a long record of mismanagement and corruption.

Another activist called on the government to re-examine the appointment of the minister and ensure that he is not appointed for any other position.

The activists said that the minister had a long record of mismanagement and corruption.

One of them said that when the minister was appointed, the performance of the department improved, but later it declined.

He said the minister had a long record of mismanagement and corruption.

Another activist called on the government to re-examine the appointment of the minister and ensure that he is not appointed for any other position.