Violence continues as talks flounder. The Afghan peace process is in danger of stalling as both sides refuse to make crucial concessions.

The Afghan government and the Taliban have made little progress in recent weeks, with both sides insisting on key demands that the other side refuses to meet.

The Taliban want the Afghan government to release all prisoners before any talks can begin, while the government wants the Taliban to first lay down their arms and stop attacks.

The lack of progress is causing frustration among the Afghan people, who have already endured years of war and displacement.

The Taliban have been responsible for some of the worst violence in Afghanistan, with their fighters involved in battles across the country.

The Afghan government, on the other hand, has been criticized for its weak leadership and failure to stem the violence.

With the situation worsening, there is growing concern that the peace process could collapse if a solution is not found soon.

The international community is urging both sides to make concessions and find a way forward, with many urging for a diplomatic solution to end the conflict.

However, with both sides entrenched in their positions, it remains to be seen if a resolution can be found.

The situation in Afghanistan continues to be critically serious, with violence and displacement affecting millions of people.

As the situation worsens, the need for a diplomatic solution becomes more urgent, with the international community calling for both sides to make concessions and find a way forward.

The Taliban have been criticized for their violence, while the Afghan government is criticized for its weak leadership.

With the situation reaching a critical point, there is a growing sense of urgency for a diplomatic solution to the conflict.