International Forces: At the Crossroads of Complete or Incomplete Withdrawal from Afghanistan

In the eye of signing peace agreement between US and Taliban, Afghan administration showed that there are great uncertainties or else other scenarios. It is a big issue whether or not the US and its allies would leave Afghanistan in clutches of terrorist's networks or responsibly and play with the life of individuals just for the hack of it. That is why Afghan administration played its role positively through offering the Taliban olive branch with the hope to bring peace and strength to the country, and enable a useful stay or with other scenarios. Afghanistan, Nicolas Kay, said that international forces will remain in Afghanistan even after a peace agreement in order to support the Afghan National Defense and Security Forces. “Let us assure you that if peace agreement is concluded, we will continue to stay and supporting Afghan national defense and security forces,” Kay said. However, US and NATO officials confirmed that the international forces are going to reduce not fully withdraw. Accordingly, the withdrawal plan needs to be confirmed and based on law. Given the current power structures in China (and Russia), the mass pro-Democracy will prove far more consequential than his tariffs. Making technology war against China, he is also doing everything he can to under

The competition with China, however, will be precisely about the question of which system delivers the greatest benefits for the future development. China's ascension from a poverty-stricken country into a modern economic powerhouse is one of the greatest achievements of the modern era. Millions of people have been lifted out of poverty and into the middle class in the past 30 years. But as China has grown stronger, its perception of itself as a new global power has also changed. China is no longer content with the status quo, which was established in the wake of the Cold War. Instead, China has become a more assertive nation, seeking to reassert its influence on the region and in the world.

China's emergence as a second military, economic, and technological superpower suggests that there is now an alternative development model. In most economies, the rule of law and democracy are regarded as a prerequisite for economic growth. But China provides a different model, which is based on centralized control and state ownership. China's success is due in part to its ability to attract foreign direct investment. And the relationship with Taiwan has, for the most part, remained relatively quiet.

For a while, China appeared to have found a formula for bridging this divide. The principle of "one country, two systems" was supposed to allow for the orderly transition of Hong Kong and (more importantly) Taiwan. Should this formula fail, the international community would have a chance to intervene, but the island's continued special status would become impossible for the Chinese government to accept or give up. Still, the formula has worked so far. Hong Kong has become exceptionally important to the Chinese economy, because it provides a bridge to the world of Western capitalism.
