TEHRAN, Iran — Iran will relinquish part of its nuclear material as part of an agreement which means for the first time in more than a decade,

Iran will allow international inspections of its nuclear facilities, a step that will be monitored by the IAEA

(United Nations atomic agency).

The agreement was announced in a statement by the foreign ministry and was endorsed by the IAEA.

The terms of the agreement are subject to negotiations between Iran and the IAEA, but it is expected to focus on limiting Iran’s nuclear activities and ensuring transparency.

The agreement is significant because it may ease tensions between Iran and the West, and potentially pave the way for a broader diplomatic resolution of the nuclear issue.
