The Afghan government has implemented a three-month program to train and help Afghan females to find suitable employment.

A three-month program which began in July is scheduled to end in December to help 75,000 Afghan women find new or better employment as part of the Afghan government's efforts to reduce the number of women living in poverty and encourage them to participate in the workforce.

The program, which is part of the government's overall strategy to promote women's rights and empower them to play a greater role in society, is being implemented in collaboration with the Ministry of Education and USAID, with support from the International Labor Organization (ILO).

Professor Susan DeCamp, a director of USAID in Afghanistan, said that the program is part of the government's efforts to promote women's rights and encourage them to participate in the workforce.

The program, which is being implemented in collaboration with the Ministry of Education and USAID, with support from the International Labor Organization (ILO), is focused on providing training and support to women who want to enter the workforce and start their own businesses.

The Afghan government has been making efforts to increase the number of women in the workforce and promote their economic empowerment. The government has implemented several policies and programs to support women's economic activities, including providing access to education, health care, and financial services.

The government has also been working to remove legal and social barriers that prevent women from participating in the workforce, including through the adoption of laws that protect their rights and promote gender equality.
