Regional Stakeholders Sign their Support to Afghan Peace Process

Regional stakeholders have expressed their support and commitment to the Afghan peace process. The international community, including the United States, China, Pakistan, and Russia, have pledged to engage in intra-Afghan dialogue and pressure the Taliban to reduce violence. The Afghan government welcomes any neighbors to play constructive roles in the peace process. Although Pakistani officials promised to allow intra-Afghan dialogue and pressure the Taliban to reduce violence, they have been accused by Afghanistan's neighbors of providing sanctuary and support to the Taliban. Meanwhile, Chinese officials seek to cement ties between Kabul and Beijing, emphasizing the importance of the Belt and Road Initiative in promoting regional stability.

Afghan President Ashraf Ghani and General Abdullah Abdullah have signed a joint declaration to support the Afghan peace process. The declaration calls for an immediate cease-fire, the release of all political prisoners, and the commencement of intra-Afghan dialogue. The Afghan government and the Taliban have agreed to resume direct talks in Qatar, aiming to reach a comprehensive peace agreement.

In addition to the Afghan government and the Taliban, other regional stakeholders have also expressed their support for the Afghan peace process. Pakistan has promised to stop providing support to the Taliban and to assist in bringing the Taliban to the negotiating table. China has expressed its commitment to promoting peace and stability in Afghanistan, while Russia has stated that it will continue to support peace talks with the United States.

In conclusion, the Afghan peace process is gaining momentum with the support of regional stakeholders. The commitment of the Afghan government, the Taliban, and other regional countries is crucial for the success of the peace process. The international community should continue to provide diplomatic and economic support to the Afghan peace process, and work towards a lasting peace in Afghanistan.
